old Garden? Rather not! And the ticket booths are like greenhouses, and the runways to the stables are fitted with trellised garden gates. A ledge of real green encircles the building, and the ring has been fixed up to form a row of boxes all around the armory, and a promenade in front of them just outside the tan bark.

This ring is a little larger and much wider than the rink at the Garden, which makes it nearly round. The entire dome has been draped with laurel ropes and bunches of autumn leaves, and the pillars are decorated like maypoles, with blue lanterns on the top of each. On the eastern wall has been built a replica of the schoolhouse in the Garden, which the Custis children attended, and this is used for an award board and for announcing the winners in the polo games. American flags on tall poles are grouped at each end of the armory, and the flag of 1777 is also used.

Last year the entries for the show numbered 1,700, while this year 2,200 entries were received, so all that is needed are spectators to make the exhibition a complete success.

Snappy Work This Year

Snappy Work This Year

By Harriette Underhill
The National Horse Show is thirtysix years old or, as Dulcy would say, "thirty-six years young," for never before has the show been held amid such gay surroundings. Even with the lavish hand of the Horse Show Association behind the decorations it was never possible to make Madison Square Garden cozy. It was too big and bleak for that, and it had too many bare iron girders to be covered with baby blue cheesecloth or evergreens.

But the armory of Squadron A lends ifself beautifully to the decorations, for while it occupies more ground space it is only about half as tall as the Garden. The keynote of the decorations this year is blue and yellow, while in previous years the colors have been red and white, the colors of the late Alfred G. Vanderbilt. The showy yellow and blue were adopted out of courtesy to Squadron A.

As nearly as possible the interior of the armory has been made over to represent the exterior of Washington's home at Mount Vernon. The porch of the old mansion has been copied and set up in the western end of the armory. This is used for a members' box and for the press room.

Snappy Work This is seemed to the spectators that the placing of the horses for conformation after the judges had decided on the merits of their performance delayed the game terribly and was not in the least interesting to the layman, and this year some one had a bright idea which resulted in all entries being judged for conformation in the morning, receiving their mark which will stand for every performance during the week. It is so simple that it seems strange no one ever decided to do it before.

It looks as though all of the 500-odd entries which have swelled the lists this year were made by the owners who were new at the national show. Among the newcomers are Jackson K. Dering, of Chicago, owner of the Cedar Crest fearm, whose hackney ponies will be shown by Mrs. Dering; Mrs. J. Hertz,
